THE HERITAGE of FLEET STREET

April 2026

Bouverie Street is a road near the west end of Fleet Street. It slopes steeply down towards the River Thames. The street was not there in the Middle Ages. Back then, the land was between a monastery and land owned by the Knights Templar.

After the Reformation, the land was sold. Around 1800, Jacob Pleydell-Bouverie, 2nd Earl of Radnor created the street and named it after his family.

At first, there were many small businesses, like lawyers, printers, flower shops, and hotels. By the early 1900s, newspapers moved in, such as the Daily Mirror and News of the World.

Today, much of the street has been rebuilt or updated. There is a painted sundial on a wall at the entrance. Many old buildings have been replaced or improved. New businesses now use the buildings.
