The Morning Post was founded in 1772. It first tried to avoid newspaper taxes by calling itself an advertising paper, but it was soon forced to follow newspaper rules.

The paper became successful under Daniel Stuart, who worked with famous writers such as William Wordsworth and Samuel Taylor Coleridge. It was also a pioneer in journalism, creating the first daily newspaper women's page and employing the first female war correspondent, Lady Florence Dixie.

In the late 1800s, editor Algernon Borthwick helped the paper grow by lowering its price and adding arts and theatre coverage. However, sales later declined.

In 1937, the Morning Post merged with the Daily Telegraph. Its name remained in the Telegraph's title until 1969.
