

LLOYD'S

WEEKLY LONDON NEWSPAPER.

No. 173

THE HERITAGE of FLEET STREET

April 2026

Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper was founded by Edward Lloyd in 1840. It began as a paper mainly publishing popular fiction, but it also included pictures of crimes and news events to attract readers. After changes to avoid newspaper taxes, it became a cheaper weekly newspaper with a wider range of news.

The paper supported working people and was known for advice columns, news stories, and reports on important events. Under editor Douglas Jerrold, sales increased, especially after coverage of the Duke of Wellington's funeral in 1852.

When newspaper taxes ended in 1855, Lloyd reduced the price and circulation grew quickly. By 1896, it became the first British newspaper to sell over one million copies in a week. After changes of ownership, the newspaper declined and finally closed in 1931.

PUNISHMENT.

It is a remarkable fact, that in our present state of civilization, we either know so little of human nature, or knowing much, are so convinced of its depravity that where we have one effort of Legislation intended to operate as a stimulus to virtuous action, we have twenty to restrain and punish crime; and it may afford a subject for useful reflection if, having satisfied ourselves as to this fact, we pursue our inquiries after the cause of it. That crime exists, and should be restrained, no one will deny, but to what are we to attribute its extraordinary prevalence amongst us, surrounded as we are by extraordinary facilities for repressing it? Is it that nature, originally prone to evil, is encouraged in the exercise of it by the misguidance of a defective education? Is it that habits of continual suffering and privation, blunt by degrees, the appetite for good? Is it that actions hitherto deemed inoffensive to society, and once even sanctioned by the laws of the country, are by a stretch of legislative purity, now deemed crimes? Or is it because, in punishing crime, and the new crime of poverty in particular, we lose sight of the motive, for the sake of punishing the act? At all events, it is evident our whole system, as regards the proper guidance of the people is wrong. Our edu-
