

The Star newspaper started on 17 January 1888. It sold 126,000 copies on its first day, setting a world record. It had four pages and cost half a penny.

The founder, Thomas Power O'Connor, wanted the newspaper to stand up for ordinary people. It reported on important events, including the Whitechapel murders and the Times Conspiracy, when false claims were made about Irish leader Charles Stewart Parnell.

In 1889, Ernest Parke became editor. By 1895, more than 150,000 copies were sold every day. The newspaper also spoke out against the Boer War, even though it lost some readers.

In the early 1900s, The Star supported campaigns for change, including ending a tax on insulin. During the World Wars, paper shortages and censorship made publishing more difficult, but the newspaper remained popular.

By the late 1940s, The Star was selling more than one million copies a day. In 1960, it joined with the Evening News and stopped being published.

Today, The Star is remembered for standing up for ordinary people and speaking out against unfairness.
