The Manchester Guardian was started in 1821 by John Taylor and his friends after the Peterloo Massacre. They wanted the newspaper to support freedom, equal rights, and political change.

At first, it was published once a week, but in 1855 it became a daily newspaper. It spoke out against slavery, supported free trade, and criticised some actions during the American Civil War.

In 1872, C. P. Scott became the editor. He made sure the newspaper stayed independent and believed that opinions should be free, but facts must always be accurate. He famously said, "Comment is free, but facts are sacred."

In 1936, the Scott Trust took ownership of the newspaper to keep it independent. In 1959, it changed its name from the Manchester Guardian to The Guardian. Today, it is still known for its independent and progressive journalism.
