Wynkyn de Worde was one of England's first printers. He came to London in 1476 to work with William Caxton, who introduced the printing press to England.

After Caxton died in 1491, de Worde took over the business and moved it near Fleet Street. He printed books that ordinary people could afford, including stories, poems, religious books and guides for everyday life. He also added pictures to make books more interesting.

During his life, de Worde printed more than 600 books. He helped improve printing in England and made books easier to read.

Wynkyn de Worde died in 1535 and was buried at St Bride's Church. Today, he is remembered as one of England's most important early printers.
