The Daily Herald began in 1911 as a newspaper created by London print workers during a strike. Its success led to the launch of a permanent daily newspaper in 1912, supported by George Lansbury and Ben Tillett.

The paper strongly supported workers' rights, women's right to vote, and social change. During the First World War, it became a weekly newspaper and was one of the few papers to oppose the war. It also supported the Russian Revolution. Although many people read it, the paper struggled to make money because it attracted little advertising.

In 1922, the Labour Party and the Trades Union Congress (TUC) took control to keep it running. After a partnership with Odhams Press, it became the first daily newspaper in the world to sell over two million copies in 1933.

Despite its popularity, financial problems continued. The paper closed in 1964 and was replaced by The Sun.

"The amelioration of prison conditions granted under Rule 243a," says Miss Pankhurst, "was extended to the women Suffragists in every case, except that of the women arrested last March. Even the 19 women sentenced at the Newington Sessions so lately as last November were allowed these ameliorations, though they also were convicted for breaking windows the cost of which exceeded £5. The women at present in prison are refused any amelioration whatsoever. They are being treated exactly like the ordinary common criminal." Miss Pankhurst adds that prominent members of the medical profession have declared that the operation of forcible feeding is attended with the greatest risks, and she calls upon the public to protest against the practice.

Mr. G. Lansbury will to-day ask the Home Secretary a series of questions relating to the sentences passed on Suffragists for window-
