The Guardian has changed over the years but has always kept its main beliefs. In 1959, it stopped being a local newspaper and became a national newspaper based in London. Its editors often made difficult choices because they believed they were the right thing to do, even when people disagreed or it cost the paper money.

From the 1970s, the Guardian changed to attract more readers. It made its writing easier to read, reported more important stories, and later used the internet to reach people around the world. These stories made the newspaper more popular, and it began to depend more on money from its readers.

In recent years, the Guardian has supported fairness, equal treatment, and protecting the environment. It has admitted mistakes from the past and made choices based on its values, such as not allowing gambling adverts. Today, it still puts its beliefs before making more money.
