In 1876, a small London newspaper was sold for £30,000. A year later, it became the Daily Chronicle under its new owner, Edward Lloyd.

Lloyd invested in new offices and modern American printing machines, making the paper faster and cheaper to produce. The newspaper shared news from Britain and around the world and helped workers find jobs.

The Daily Chronicle became famous for supporting workers' rights. It backed Welsh miners during strikes, campaigned for better prisons, and published a letter by Oscar Wilde.

The paper became even more popular during the First World War. In 1918, Lloyd George bought it, and it began supporting his political views instead of staying independent. He sold it in 1926, but the new owners focused only on making money. The paper declined and, in 1930, merged with the Daily News to become the News Chronicle.
