

The News of the World was first published in 1843 by John Browne Bell. It was created as a cheap newspaper for ordinary people and soon became one of Britain's most popular weekly papers.

After the Bell family sold it in 1891, editor Emsley Carr helped it grow by introducing free gifts, insurance schemes, and reader competitions. The paper became famous for its mix of news, crime stories, celebrity gossip, and human-interest stories. It also helped readers through advice articles and self-help books.

The newspaper reached record sales, selling over 8 million copies in the early 1950s. In 1969, it was bought by Rupert Murdoch, who introduced changes such as a colour magazine and a tabloid format. Wikipedia records that, from 2006, allegations of phone-hacking began to engulf the newspaper, and News International announced in 2011 that it would be shut down.

The News of the World published its final issue on 10 July 2011 after 168 years of publication.

THE POLITICIAN.

THE POSITION OF THE NATION.

In presenting to the public, the first number of this paper, it will naturally be expected that a few words should be addressed by its conductors to those whose patronage it claims, and to whose favour it is confidently hoped, it will prove itself entitled. The general utility of all classes, is the idea with which this paper originated. To give to the poorer classes of society a paper that would suit their means, and to the middle, as well as the rich, a journal, which from its immense circulation, should command their attention, have been the influencing motives that have caused the appearance of "THE NEWS OF THE WORLD." We shall make no apology for those motives, because, we conceive, that in their accomplishment we shall attain an end, that in the present state of England is not only desirable, but absolutely necessary. Journalism for the rich man, and journalism for the poor, has up to this time, been as broadly and distinctly marked, as the manners, the dress, and the habitations of the rich, are from the customs, the squalor, and the dens of the poor. The paper for the wealthy classes is high priced, it is paid for by them, and it helps to lull them in the security of their prejudices. The paper for the poorer classes is on the other hand, low priced, and it is paid for by them; it feels bound to pander to their passions. TRUTH, when it offends a prejudice, and shews the evil of passion, is frequently excluded from both. The first is often as remarkable for its talent, for its early intelligence, as the other, we regret to say, is for the absence of talent, and the staleness of its news. What then, is desirable? A paper that will combine the attractions of the rich newspaper, and that from the smallness of its price, will be certain to secure a circulation amongst the poor and the rich. It will serve as a point of approximation—and we think it cannot but be serviceable by doing so; for it will tell the truth to all, and of all. It will seek for the patronage of no party—it will conceal neither the merits nor the faults of any party, but it will aim alone at doing good service to old England, by maintaining her glory and security, the prosperity of all classes of the people. This is our object, and now let us see whether the present state of affairs, do not call for a paper, such as "THE NEWS OF THE WORLD" will prove itself to be?
