Reynolds Newspaper was a popular Sunday newspaper aimed at working-class readers. It was launched in 1850 by George W. M. Reynolds, who was already a successful novelist. His novel The Mysteries of London focused on crime and poverty and helped him become involved in the Chartist movement.

The newspaper became known for sensational stories about crime, police investigations and accidents. However, it was also strongly radical. It supported workers' rights, universal male suffrage and republican ideas, while criticising the monarchy, aristocracy and inequality between rich and poor.

The paper became cheaper in the 1860s, helping its sales grow. It remained popular with working-class and lower-middle-class readers and later supported Labour and the Co-operative Party. In 1962 it became the Sunday Citizen and stopped publishing in 1967.
